

Photosynthesis

Photosynthesis is the process by which plants convert light energy into chemical energy stored in glucose. The light-dependent reactions occur in the thylakoid membrane, where chlorophyll absorbs photons and drives the transfer of electrons.

The Calvin cycle

The Calvin cycle fixes carbon dioxide into three-carbon sugars using the ATP and NADPH produced by the light reactions. Rubisco catalyses the first committed step of carbon fixation.